THE SCOOPS OF OTHER DAYS

How One of Them Caused an Omaha Journalist's Untimely End. "I don't know how it is with you newspaper men here," remarked an individual who figured about the Omaha "print shop" a score or more years ago, as he incidentally referred to a statement in The Bee, some time ago, and more good understanding existing between Vischer and Miner when they presided over the city columns of the Herald and Republican respectively, in the '70s, "but the time is fresh in memory when the height of the city editor's ambition was to score a scoop on his contemporaries. Of course, Miner and Vischer were bosom friends, and either would scorn to 'take someone's' without asking the other to join him in the potation if anywhere within halting distance. If a small loan, even, were asked and the importuned was in condition, financially, to comply with such a request, the subject would be forthcoming with a cheerfulness equaled only by the thankfulness with which it was received. Not so, however, in the case of the Omaha journalist, the intelligence of whose untimely end was a foregone conclusion. Reports of stated public gatherings, political assemblies, etc., etc., were exchanged night after night, and the subject was a frequent topic of conversation. He was being exhorted, put in readiness, and swapped as matters of accommodation, these newspaper representatives were scattered in the city, and the subject was no longer in the city. The subject was no longer in the city. The subject was no longer in the city.
